A Friendly Word

This is the school we are building —
The gladness that touches its walls
Is the friendliness we have been spreading
As we have lingered in classrooms or halls.
These hands that we are extending Invite you to laughter and dreams,
To contentment in working together
As comrades in classrooms, on teams.

The Student Council assembly committee and the chairman of the faculty assembly committee discuss plans for assembly programs for the year.

For Your Benefit

As a reward for their diligence, only carefully selected students are intrusted with your student service and governmental responsibilities.

more armbands have been purchased for the club's use, and that members are required to buy season football and basketball tickets as well as armbands. In the home rooms, representatives from the Red Cross committee are urging the students to contribute toward this year's goal of four hundred fifty dollars. The safety and health committees have kept a girl in the office during third and fourth hours tabulating the number, frequencies, and causes of absences in order that preventive measures may be taken next year.

"The business of the day was an account, by the vice-president, of the city-wide Student Council meeting held at East High School. At her suggestion, it was moved and seconded that our council follow the example set by other schools and create a historical committee, for the period of one year, to keep a record of school activities. After much discussion, the motion was carried. It was decided that the matter was to be brought up at the executive meeting.

"The critic's report was given, and the meeting then adjourned."

The president asks for corrections or additions; the minutes are approved and ordered filed. Having explained, for the benefit of the new members, that each person in the student council is required to serve upon some committee, he next calls for committee reports.

The chairman of the assembly committee announces that a student talent assembly is to be held, and requests all representatives to urge the students of their home rooms to try out for the program. Cooperating with the assembly committee of the faculty, he adds, the student assembly committee is making arrangements for both entertaining and beneficial programs, covering the subjects of safety, school spirit, Armistice Day, Christmas, student talent, and commemoration of renowned heroes. Students who do not wish to attend assemblies are to sign up for a study hall during that period. As in no previous year, the social functions of the school are being successfully managed by the students in cooperation with the faculty.

Plans for a mixer, under the recently adopted title of Southwest Swing Session, advertising for which is being handled by the publicity committee, are reported by the social committee.

The library and parking committee urges students not to park in restricted zones, and the locker committee announces a list of regulations concerning lockers to be taken by each representative to his home room. Keeping people out of trouble, not serving as spies, is the duty of these committees.

The service committee informs the council that the corridor guide system is to be continued, under the supervision of Miss Hutchison. As before, the guides are to be selected by the corridor committee, upon the recommendations of the teachers, on a basis of their sense of responsibility and courtesy, their attitude toward service, and their scholarship ranking. The committee stresses that its chief object is to aid the students in learning to control themselves by adherence to the rules of the corridor code:

1. Follow the arrows.
2. Walk, never run.
3. Keep moving.
4. Never whistle or shout.
5. Keep the floors clean.

The cafeteria guards help to maintain the same standard of courtesy during lunch hours.

When new business is called for, a suggestion is made that additional bicycle racks be provided. After discussion, the matter is referred to the research committee.

Remarks are made about the length of meetings due to extensive discussion.

The president asks Mr. Cannon, as main sponsor, to make a few remarks about the aims of the student council. He states that the council strives for social entertainment, service to the community, and the development of citizenship, Miss Mary Moore, Miss Cleora Hutchison, and Mr. James Bennett having charge of the various activities under each of these headings. The object of the Student Council organization is to provide self-government of the student body through a cooperation of the students and the faculty.

The critic's report is given and the meeting adjourns.

As the student council is the governing power for the student body, the senior officers, with the senior business committee, compose the negotiating power for the graduation class. With the cooperation of their sponsor, Mr. Powell, and the faculty representatives, Miss Boulton and Mr. MacCurdy, the senior business committee expedites the business of the class with a minimum of time and confusion.

In the fall, each senior nominated five persons as senior officers. The seven receiving the greatest number of recommendations were voted upon for their respective offices, resulting in Jack O'Hara as president, John Fletcher as vice-president, Art Robinson as giftorian, Bob Scott as secretary, Jean O'Hara as treasurer, Carolyn Scott as sergeant-at-arms, and Margaret Neal as publicity director. The thirteen next highest combine with these officers to form the senior business committee, which handles all of the business of the senior class through specific committees, such as commencement, announcements and publicity, class jewelry, class gift, boys' and girls' dress for graduation, entertainment, and senior play committees. We Came, We Saw . . .

Even the greatest, must find the way a little rocky.

FOOTBALL

Southwest entered her 1937-38 career in football on a mild fall day. Victory seemed to be in the offing, but a mighty opposing team proved to be too much for the Indians, who, however, fairly contended their opponents' victory.

If one had listened closely in the majestic Halls of Learning soon after the game took place, he could have heard such remarks as this: "We're sure to win next time. We did fine last year after getting off to a poor start and we surely ought to be able to do it this year. I know we can win if we get the breaks; they just weren't with us this time." Stout hearted fellows, these! Men in whose hearts dwells the adage that if "at first you do not succeed, try, try again."

Southwest again went out on the field of battle to conquer its foe. Valiant efforts, striving players, fruitless runs and passes! Try as they might the Indians could not win; their foe proved too strong.

What of the Bravelet's progress at this time?

Public interest in football was beginning to wane when suddenly it came upon Southwest students that they had a second team seemingly second to none. While the first team had been fighting in the field goaded on by uproarious cheers from well-filled bleachers, the Bravelets had been playing to a few spectators who happened, by some odd quirk of fate, to arrive on the field while a game was in progress.

Strange to say, though, the second team had been winning all of the games they had been playing; not by a few points, but by wide margins. They were gaining a prestige that no team seemed to be able to put down.

The great news about the second team had been spread in a manner such as this: "Say, we really have a second team there. They look as if they will be able to do a lot toward a championship next year. I don't see why they don't exchange with the first team. At least, they win their games." Public opinion was turning their way.

But though the Indian Braves had tasted defeat, and loss of prestige, their spirits were not dulled; and they went into their next game, with Westport, to win—and win they did, by a comfortable margin, at that. And with that victory came back to them the confidence of their fellows.

Then for a second time they went out to victory; and in a game full of action and overflowing with the thrills of football, they fairly mopped up the field with the Paseo Bears.

The team now had the hope of further victories in their minds. Thus they went out on the following Saturday to defeat Central. But Central must not have recognized the fact that “we” were supposed to win, because they won by some margin of points, causing Southwest to chalk up another defeat upon the record for the year.

These victors wrecked the hopes of those steadfast rooters who had been hoping and praying for Southwest to get a second or third place in the interscholastic league. But, then, there were those who consoled themselves with the argument that not everybody can beat Westport and Paseo, and Southwest had done that.

What of our conquering second team at this time? They had continued on their steamroller advance towards victory until Central’s mighty second team blasted their chances of achieving first place. They came up in the end, however, with a second place.

Although Southwest did not achieve two championships as she did last year, she is, nevertheless, proud of her present teams for their courage and their clean, good sportsmanship.

GOLF

While some of the sports were hurt by the forced delay at the beginning of the year, golf, which is not practiced at school, was not. The matches, however, were delayed for some time. In the matches between the schools, Gilbert Davis, the only letterman, showed himself to considerable advantage, while the team won a third place.

TENNIS

The tennis team, which also had a very late start, was able, under the apt supervision of Mr. MacCurdy, to forge ahead and bring back a second-place tie to be chalked up to its good record. Of the six boys on the tennis teams, five were able to gain letters for excellent playing.

Due to the late start, there will be interclass matches held in the spring, a fact pleasing to those who could not participate last fall.

Sports Day Powwow

Summoned to the Southwest camping grounds by messages written upon small Indian canoes, the girl hockey players of the city met November 12, for a combat and powwow. The captains having drawn tournament cards which stated the name, color, and schedule of their own and opponents' tribes, the teams entered the field, and played the three games each in a round robin tournament. On the field was a temporary first-aid station attended by Miss Elma Dreyer and student assistants.

The girls were afterwards welcomed to the cafeteria, decorated with trailing pumpkin vines and other symbols of the harvest season, by the president of the Squad Leaders' Club in full Indian chief regalia, and listened to addresses by Mr. Monsees and Mr. H. G. Danford, director of health and physical education in Kansas City, Missouri. Each participant carried home with her the realization that the keynote to a successful sports day is "cooperation" of teams, leaders, and schools.

RESUME

Somewhere east of the Rio Grande is a famous sanatorium and spring owned and operated by Dr. Drinkwater. Years before, Dr. Drinkwater disowned his son, who married an actress against his father's wishes.

The boy's mother grieved for her son, and when she died, she left her wealth to her granddaughter, Gloria, on the condition that she spend the twenty-four hours before her twenty-first birthday with her grandfather.

But Gloria, an actress, too, is under contract to appear in South America at that time. She sends her friend Helen to the sanatorium in her stead, but then she finds she must go herself because her fiance, Bob, is there.

When Gloria, Helen, and Helen's sick mother, Madam Chere, arrive, the fun and trouble begin. Philip, a young ranch owner in love with Helen, plots with Bessie, the maid, to frighten everyone with a story about a rustler so he can see Helen. When a bandit really arrives and kidnaps Bessie and Rainbow, Helen will not believe it.

The situation is climaxed when Philip discovers a letter which leads him to believe Helen is deceiving him. But all ends as it should.

Interested students, patrons, and friends are hurrying down the aisles to their seats before the curtain opens for the largest production of the year, the all-school operetta "Oh, Doctor!" Excitement runs high; the interest is keen; there is a capacity crowd; it promises to be a good show. Orchestra! Lights! Curtain! The show is on!

What do we see! Cowboys and cowgirls, senioritas, patients, doctors, and comely nurses—all praising the ostentatious Dr. Drinkwater, in whose sanatorium the story is enacted, and behind whose large spectacles and pomposity we recognize Gilbert Davis. In spite of much nervous confusion before the raising of the curtain, the choral work under the guidance of Mr. Milton proves excellent. Our introduction to Dr. Drinkwater's assistants, the Doctors Slaughter, Cuttem, and Coffin, culminates in an hilarious dance performed with the cooperation of Mrs. I-haven't-had-a-square-meal-in-seven-days Weakly, the deaf Mrs. Crossly, and the overly sweet Cynthia.

Love complications and lovely music are provided by the rising young soprano, Yvonne Lilley, from the ranks of the sophomores, and the personable Bill Jenkins. Nancy Miller's solo to Bob, Al Huttig, in the closing scenes proves to be one of the highlights of the evening, while the antics of "Ah's amblin'" Rainbow and "Bessie, the Scream," in contrast to the wistful appeal of Pancho, will not soon be forgotten.

The lightest of the several dancing choruses, directed by Miss Betz, is "Laughing in the Rain," with dancers arrayed in bright-colored cellophane capes which rustle in time to the tapping feet. In an adagio dance, John Fehlandt tosses about the sylphic Shirley Burkhardt with breathtaking grace and skill.

Adapting themselves to the mood of each number, Mr. Zahn and his musicians play an inconspicuous but all important role, faithfully "harping away" in the orchestra pit.

Behind the scenes, the gym is in a hum of excitement—an agitated mixture of cowgirls, señoritas, and goddesses. At the word of the call-girl, the chorus crowds toward the door, and at her instruction, "No talking, and easy on the heels," the group responds with "sh-h-h!" and the vast chorus is soon again on the stage.

Room 202 has been transformed from an ordinary classroom into a make-up parlor with cold cream, powder, rouge, crepe hair, and paper towels scattered about in profusion. With Miss Castle as overseer, the wielders of the grease-paint, bibbed with towels, performed many wonders, even transforming blonde Beatrice Peet into the dignified, grey-haired Madame Chere and causing Time also to lay a heavy hand upon the brows of Mrs. Crossly, Mrs. Weakly, and Dr. Drinkwater before they leave the room.

Stepping backstage while the show is on, we see George Wander, the stage manager, directing his assistants in the setting of the stage picture. Among their special problems are the lighting effects in the twilight scene for the "Angelus" chorus, the control of the three hanging microphones, never before used on this stage, and the creation of an illusion of rapid transition backward to the days of Greek gods and goddesses.

For the success of this, the most completely "all-school" production Southwest has ever had, the cast is deeply indebted to Mr. Ramay, who, megaphone in hand and sleeves rolled up, worked with tireless enthusiasm, urging the actors on to triumph.

The best gift of the wise old cobbler was love. Students of Southwest will long remember him, as he was portrayed at the Christmas assembly by Paul Uhlmann, in a play adapted from Tolstoi's story, "Where Love Is," and will reflect upon the meaning of Christmas as the cobbler interpreted it.

Asked my partner if she was going to stay up to see Santa. She said she didn't think she would as she had no one to wait up with her. Whereupon, instead of forcing my lead, I let the matter rest. Sometimes I wonder

Resolved: That . . .

If you like to win your arguments don't engage with these!

Clashing in spirited school rivalry, the Southwest debate teams have verbally duelled with the other contending high schools this year on the subject, "Resolved: That the several states should adopt a unicameral system of legislation." The debaters are chosen from the public speaking classes and meet two afternoons a week to receive constructive criticism from Mr. Ramay, their adviser, and to practice the fundamentals and strategy of debate. Each member has a file of approximately one hundred cards with his arguments organized on them.

Every school in the inter-city meet has its own negative and affirmative teams. While the Southwest affirmative team travels to the opposing school, its own negative team remains on home ground to receive the affirmative team of that school. All debates are non-decisive, thus creating more friendly rivalry among the inter-city high schools.

The purpose of these debate teams is to give students with ability in public speaking the opportunity of broad experience in the field and to broaden their knowledge of current news.

Our Newest Organization

This year Southwest placed its own battalion in the front line of the greatest war in United States history—the fight against automobile fatalities.

This year introduces to Southwest the Drivers Club, whose aims, as outlined by Mr. Gordon Wesner, faculty adviser, are to promote safety consciousness among the future drivers of America and to teach them safe driving habits. The club held its first meeting December 21, and by the beginning of the second semester had attained full membership and had many applicants on the waiting list.

The membership of the club is open to all above the freshman level and each home room has at least one representative. These students were chosen as officers: president, Noel Wood; vice-president, Bill Norris; secretary, Shirley Bergin; treasurer, Eugene Deffenbaugh; sergeant-at-arms, Sam Edwards; and historian, Ed Adams.

The fervor displayed in sponsoring a contest for safety stickers for their automobiles and in obtaining books on safe driving to aid in preparation for the comprehensive drivers' test, is proof of the interest felt by the members in this new club.

The three E's used as a slogan are: Education, Engineering, and Enforcement of Law.

The Spirit Was Willing

But look at what happened to Napoleon!!

BASKETBALL

Basketball was invented as a game to be substituted for the rougher one of football. It was to be played indoors, instead of out; to feature passing instead of running with the ball; and to decrease the number of injuries resulting from the roughness of football.

It is the only game which has been continuously played by the high schools of Kansas City. Football was at one time outlawed by the schools, thus leaving basketball the premier game. The games were first held in the gymnasiums of the competing schools, and later transferred to the old Convention Hall.

At the time of the building of the Municipal Auditorium, the query was raised as to whether the games could be played within the walls of that beautiful exhibition building. The matter was finally settled, and now for the second year the interscholastic games were to be played in the Auditorium.

The sages of Southwest hoped for victory to balance the losses encountered by the football team, but were doomed to disappointment.

After an inspirational assembly, the Indians entered upon their first encounter of the year. Manual had lost her star player. Southwest had a group of boys that could be overcome under no condition.

Southwestians yelled themselves hoarse giving encouragement but to no avail, for Southwest went down in her first defeat of the year. Still, spirit was high. Human beings are prone to look upon the past instead of the present, and we, remembering former records, decided that we could lose one game and still come out on top of the heap.

One week later, the Indians again encountered a foe upon the field of battle. Again, they lost. Although hope was waning, it did not give out entirely; Southwest still had high hopes of some success.

The second team at this time had been coming along famously, duplicating the record of the second team in football. Thoughts turned toward future years, when this second team would become our first. The first team was good, but the second team seemed better able to handle those in its class.

The first team had lost two games. Other schools, that had begun to think they could all beat the Indians, received a surprise in the form of a scalping of the Westport team, as Southwest for the first time in the year, carried home a victory.

We had won a game! We were indomitable! Surely no one could beat us now that we had won a game and tasted of victory. But, alas! victory did not remain. In the next two games Southwest went down before her opponents in pitiful defeat. Valiantly the team tried to win, but each time some bit of bad fortune seemed doomed to fall upon them.

The second team had also tasted of defeat during this time, losing two games in "do or die" battles; nevertheless, it came out among the top-ranking teams to hold second place in the league, the position also held by the second football team. With the memory of past glory, and the anticipation of triumphs to come through the promising members of the 1939 team, it should not be difficult for Southwest to accept philosophically the reverses of this season.

Teamwork Among the Girls

The program for the girls' physical education department changes constantly to keep pace with the trend of the times, but the following objectives remain constant: (1) developing character and citizenship by providing an interest for leisure; (2) promoting good health and physical fitness by providing wholesome activities which all are capable of enjoying; and, (3) assuring a permanent interest in sports by giving a fair knowledge of the fundamentals, and, to all girls in Southwest, opportunity to develop skill in various intramural sports, this year including hockey, basketball, volley ball, baseball, swimming, folk dancing, and tennis. Each girl winning a place on intramural teams receives a feather, on which an arrow is marked for each of her teams, the sixth bringing her the highest award, an orange and black shield, and the twelfth a star on the shield.

Leaders of divisions in the physical education classes form the Squad Leaders Club, which meets each week for special instruction in coming activities. The members of this club must maintain a grade of E or S in class work.

Like the squad leaders, the office assistants are chosen on the basis of scholastic standing, as well as readiness to serve and ability to meet office responsibilities.

The Spring Concert

The sixth annual spring concert of the music department of Southwest came as the high point in a successful year of band, orchestra, and choral work. The beautiful music was rendered to the largest audience ever drawn by the concerts. Proceeds from the sale of tickets will be used to buy instruments and sheet music.

Opening the evening's entertainment, the orchestra, larger than ever before, gave a distinctive performance.

When the curtains next parted the audience gasped with delight at the myriad shades of pastel displayed by the recently enlarged girls' glee club. The a cappella choir, similar in appearance and size to the glee club, produced artistic strains of folk and religious music.

The pep and spirit of the lively marches of the band contrasted with the subdued color of their uniforms, while the sweet melody of the semi-classic music stirred the audience. After sedate and fantastic tunes had been played the program was concluded with another stirring march.

The concert has been proclaimed as the "most balanced program ever heard at Southwest"—a tribute to the selection of the numbers as well as to the performance of them.

The Tooters' Club has continued to aid the band and orchestra this year in purchasing several new instruments. Through various entertainments and the whole-hearted support of the band activities, the parents of these musicians have helped materially in building up the splendid organization of both band and orchestra now at Southwest.

Seven Keys to Baldpate

Guns, screams, perambulating corpses, keys, keys, and keys!—no, not an insane asylum, but a summer resort in the middle of winter is the setting for the senior play “Seven Keys to Baldpate,” a mysterious melodramatic farce by George M. Cohan, presented at Southwest on May 6, 1938.

A bitter wind howled as the curtains parted on the dimly lighted hotel office of Baldpate Inn into which entered the aged caretaker and wife, Elijah and Mother Quimby. The sympathy of the audience was quickly won by the quaint, smiling mother and the wide-eyed Elijah whose goatee wagged intriguingly as his jaws moved. The young novelist, Magee, for whom they had opened the hotel, arrived shortly after and condescended to explain that he had chosen the isolated spot for the scene of a novel to be written within twenty-four hours, according to a bet made with the owner of the resort. Having been given the only existing key to Baldpate, he was assured that no one ever came up there in winter, the sole exception having been the local politicians and reformers who, on a night several years before had made the inn the center of a dispute over graft money.

During the first and second acts, Magee was interrupted at his work successively, by a gangster, a newspaperwoman and her chaperon, a hermit, a pretended banker's wife, a small-town mayor and his assistant, a railroad president, and a country sheriff, with keys and keys. He managed within twenty-four hours to fall in love; be locked in a closet by gangsters; see a ghost; be accused of murder and insanity; undergo a grilling; hear a confession by the real murderer—only to learn that the entire affair had been a hoax perpetrated by his friend Bentley, who now offered to cancel the bet. Against a background of false beards and false characters, the one enduring reality was the love between Magee and Mary.

The whimsical cynicism of Magee in the opening scene merged into an amused acceptance of all the impossibly dramatic tragedies confronting him throughout the play. Expressing his love for the demure and charming Mary, hearing unanimous accusations of murder, he could not refrain from Puckish grimaces at an annoyingly vigilant chaperon, or subtle mockery of the simple and bewildered Sheriff Kennedy. A swaggering, sinister gangster, was too much his own brain-child to hold any fears of him.

Peters, the hermit, and the jittery Max were convincing fanatics, the one cherishing an active dislike of "wimmen," and the other crazed by drugs and by the trickery of his beloved Myra, who portrayed with equal skill a cheap raucousness of character and a modified dignity. Mayor Cargan was a hardened politician who managed to leave to Max and Bland the more disagreeable and dangerous tasks of his crooked plan. The unexcitable railroad president, Hayden, was most notable as he confirmed the amount of the theft, two hundred thousand dollars, with a nod of sincere and touching grief.

The apparent finality of the closing scene served to increase the astonishment of the audience when the Epilogue disclosed a finished manuscript in the hand of Magee, whose imagination had seized upon the chance words of Elijah Quimby as a basis for a mock-melodramatic novel that met all the specifications stipulated in the bet.

After a long wait, Southwest is now going to have a swimming pool. This will add considerably to the athletic curriculum, and will enable Southwest to enroll her name in the list of schools participating in the swimming events.

This year Southwest entered a team in the interschool contest held at the Kansas City Athletic Club, hoping by some chance to gain a small amount of recognition. Having had no chance for practice within the school, the team nevertheless vigorously entered the competition and carried off second place, a result hardly anticipated.

Eleven boys were able to gain letters for their work on the team.

In the future, Southwest will be able to have more thoroughly trained teams, and should be able to carry off one championship after another. With the installation of its pool Southwest will have a catalog of sports which will offer something of interest to every type of student.

TRACK 1937

In the spring of the year come the track tryouts. Many young aspirants don track suits and prance around on the gravel in the hope that they may be able to run better or faster, jump farther or higher, put the shot a great distance farther, than their nearest competitors.

Kenny Hamilton, himself an outstanding athlete, captained the '36-'37 team to the position of third place among the schools of the city, which accomplishment, considering the competition offered, was exceedingly good.

For the past several years, in fact, Southwest has alternated between third and fourth place in the Interscholastic League track meet held annually at Southwest in May.

With the coming and going of the years, Southwest receives her share of the honors. This season's sophomores have shown ability that gives promise of strong teams for the next two years. As the Sachem goes to press before the track events take place, no account of this year's meet can be here given.

THE COUNTRYSIDE IN FALL

By Constance Harper

The world is all so beautiful,
I scarce can keep from singing;
God round about with generous hand
His treasure has been flinging;
The trees shake painted castanets,
Like senoritas dancing;
The west wind whistles up a tune
To set my feet a-prancing;
The stony hills and yellow fields,
I hear them crying, crying;
And shedding worry, off I go,
My winged feet a-flying.

*I'll race you to the hill-top,
I'll race you to the spring,
I'll race you to yon farmer's gate,
And then come back again!*

The sky is blue as polished steel,
The coldness starts me stamping,
But over all the countryside
My eager feet go tramping.
The world, the world is beautiful!
I scarce can keep from singing;
My heart recaptures nature's song,
And skyward sends it winging.

PERSONALITY—COPYRIGHTED

By Margaret Speer

The sun streaked in through the Venetian blinds and shimmered on a solitary object basking on a glass topped bedside table. Bound in blue and lettered in gold, it reposed with all the superiority that a best-seller could demand. A crimson tipped hand slowly reached out from beneath the covers and groped for the book. Located, it was transferred to the bed. There, a drowsy eyed, dark person propped herself up with pillows and opened "You Must Be Personality" to a page near the back. She began to read. Fifteen minutes later, the girl closed the book, languidly stretched, and then snuggled back beneath the down quilt. "You Must Be Personality" slipped to the floor with a thud. The person in the bed jumped, threw back the covers, gently picked the book up and placed it on the table.

"Well, ah declah! If yo' picked up yo' clothes lak that book, ah wouldn't—"

"Oh, hello, Lucy," interrupted the early morning bookworm. "Simply too divine today, isn't it?"

"Simply too dee-vahn! Laws, since yo' bin studin' that pusinality book, yo's bin sayin' the dumbest things! Next thing, ah'll be havin' t' call yo'

'Miss Camilia'." And the darky chuckled to herself.

But Cam's face lighted up. Did not the book say to have the servants respect one? So, with a commanding voice, the small girl said:

"Oh, yes, Lucy, you may begin addressing me 'Miss Camilia' now. After all, I was thirteen last week, and you don't call mother by her first name even though you knew her when she was little. And I don't want to wear that red corduroy robe—lay out my powder blue negligee, please."

With a look of astonishment on her black face, the maid just stood for a minute with her arms akimbo and stared at Cam, who was now plucking her eyebrows according to a diagram in the opened book before her.

"Well, carry me to a party!" Lucy muttered as she hung the red corduroy robe back in the closet and brought out the seldom worn, flowing, blue negligee. Throwing the dressing gown on the bed, she shuffled out of the room, saying as she went:

"Miss Pusinality—if it ain't too much trouble—breakfust am served—in the kitchen."

Cam slipped out of bed. "Take your time, it is the sign of poise," was the doctrine of "You Must Be Personality" which whirled through Camilia's mind as she slowly donned her powder blue negligee and gazed approvingly at the figure in the mirror.

"Cam!" An impatient voice booming from the kitchen practically pushed her half way down the stairs, before the girl remembered "You Must Be Personality's" advice, "Be mysterious." So, with a little swish and a dash of glamour, Camilia glided into the kitchen.

"Yo' mothah's downtown," Lucy informed Cam with a voice which almost overlooked her "Kin yo' keep yoself whahl ah go grocerin'?"

The figure in the powder blue sitting on a kitchen stool glanced up from her breakfast with a look of scorn.

"You can be gone as long as you please. I can take care of myself perfectly well. Nobody seems to have sense enough to realize that I'm a young lady who can master difficulties." And Cam dug into her melon with such force that a piece flew to the floor.

The back door slammed—then only Cam's crunching of toast was audible. Having finished eating, she glided out of the kitchen. The doorbell pierced the silence and the Lady of Personality went to answer it.

"Are you the mistress of the house?" asked a shabbily dressed young man carrying a case, when Camilia opened the door.

"Well, at the present, yes. No one is home but me," she answered in the voice that had been adopted after reading Chapter VII, "You Talk and Are Judged."

The caller paused for a minute, then said, "Well, I suppose you can help as well as anybody. I'm from the Replate Your Silver Company and have been sent after the silver to be done over. You can let me in and give it to me, can't you?"

Camilia thought that it was peculiar that her mother had not mentioned his coming, but "You Must Be Personality" said never to be rude or inhospitable to strangers at one's own home, so she unlatched the door and the young man walked in.

"Our silverware is in the top drawer of that buffet," explained Cam as she led the visitor into the dining room. The young man, obviously nervous, put the case carelessly on the highly polished mahogany table and opened it. Cam's heart bounded to her throat, and she sank down on the nearest chair. The case was empty—except for a revolver. What did the book advise in a predicament like this? For the first time her most treasured possession had failed her—it did not offer a solution to the problem of robbery.

He looked desperate—this person who had gained access to the house through Camilia's door of hospitality. His tall stature, accentuated by the sharpness of his features, reminded Camilia of Rasil Bathbone in his most villainous role, and she shuddered to think of the outcome. With a resounding thud, this treacherous person placed the sinister revolver on the table within his reach and Cam gasped for breath.

And then, as danger and despair surrounded her, the words, "Be calm, be poised—practice self-control every day," thrust themselves into Camilia's mind. That was the solution! Since Personality had lured her into the terrifying clutches of peril, it was the logical means of rescue. Gathering together all her copyrighted charms, the frightened girl of thirteen began.

"What's y o u r n a m e ?" Cam inquired, remembering that the book said one's own name was the sweetest sounding utterance in the world.

"Michael Roberts," was the clipped reply as the young man picked up a knife, examined it, and put it in his case.

"Oh, may I call you Robby? I do just love nicknames," vivaciously questioned the girl. Cam had decided that, according to the book's rating chart, this fellow was the silent type. She shuddered—Two Gun Ike, Public Enemy Number One, was noted for his taciturnity.

Michael Roberts directed his steel blue eyes in Cam's direction with a glance of incredibility. Never had anyone spoken in that manner to him. May she call him Robby—he snickered.

"There is no topic so dear to one's heart as that one about himself," quoted Miss Personality to herself, and then coyly remarked,

"Were you ever a basketball hero—you're so tall and everything. And I do just love athletes."

Roberts' stoic expression brightened for a minute as he answered Cam. Yes, he had played the game in high school. With a curious note in her voice, Camilia asked him to tell her all about it, as basketball absolutely thrilled her. The book said to be a good listener, no matter how bored one was, and she must keep this person in the house until Lucy returned. However, with the advent of each minute, the girl collected her senses which had been scattered by the winds of circumstance.

Michael Roberts, while narrating his story, had finished packing the last piece of silver in his case and was closing the lid when Camilia interrupted him.

"Oh, I forgot, but you don't have all the stuff. There's some down here on the closet shelf, but I can't reach it so you'll have to come with me and get it."

"Of course," answered the shabbily dressed person as he picked up the menacing revolver and slipped it nonchalantly into his pocket. It made the girl shiver, but remembering the book—"No feat is too difficult to conquer"—she hoped her plan would work.

The huge closet was at the end of the hall. Opening the door, and snapping on the light, Camilia indicated to Michael Roberts where he could find the silverware.

"It's on the back shelf—that box up there. Maybe you'll have to move the trunk to get it. Will you excuse me just a minute?"

"Of course," he answered, as he pushed a broken chair out of his way and entered the closet. The time had come. Safety was within Camilia's reach and she grasped for it. Backing out of the store room, and after almost tripping on the train of her powder blue negligee, Cam noiselessly closed the door and clicked the lock. With the awkwardness of age thirteen, she seized the nearby chair and propped it against the door, and sighed a breath of relief. Should she scream—she wanted to, but no—"You Must Be Personality" advocated lady-like manners at all times. That probably meant she should faint, but that was impossible. Then, hardly knowing what she did in the next five minutes as the pounding and pleas issued forth from the hall closet, Camilia acted.

The shrill sirens stopped before the Anthony home and two blue-uniformed figures leaped out of the car. Neighbors peeked from upstairs windows and some rushed over to the scene of excitement. Already at the door, Camilia welcomed the officers with an incoherent story and led them to the end of the hall where the closet door was shaking with splintering force.

"We've got you covered," boomed one of the policemen. "Be peaceable and there won't be no shootin'."

"Let me out of here! I say, let me out of here! Believe me, you'll answer for this when my company hears about it! They'll sue you for false arrest." The person in the closet kicked the door and Cam began to wonder if, after all, he were the silent type.

While Officer Duffy guarded the door, the other policeman cautiously unlatched the lock. Michael Roberts, his face flushed and perspiring, glared at those around him. He demanded an explanation of the outrage. He had been called to get some silver to be replated, and arriving at the house, not only was treated as if he were mentally deficient, but had been locked up in a closet. Did one have to go through that ordeal every time he worked for Camilia's mother?

Cam could remain quiet no longer. "I don't think mother called to have her silverware replated, and furthermore, Mr. Roberts, why do you carry a gun. Or does it help you get silver?" She challenged in a sarcastic voice that she had not used since she was a child—of twelve.

"I only know that I was supposed to get the silverware at 1227 East 67 Street, and I carry a gun because only last week someone tried to rob me," was the retort that opened both the officers' eyes and Camilia's.

1227 East 67 Street. It was so easily explained. The Anthony address was 1227 West 67 Street, and it was only a case of mistaken numbers. The cloud had been cleared and apologies shined from both sides. It was but a few moments until everything was tranquil again — except Camilia's thoughts. The neighbors' grinning faces and their laughing remarks remained with her, although everyone had departed.

Once more in the solitude of her room, she stared at the book on the bedside table. Then she picked it up and carried it over to the bookcase, into which she jammed it in a far back corner. Camilia had decided to purchase "Your Destiny by the Stars." Perhaps it would guide her more gracefully over the ironical paths of life than the once treasured "You Must Be Personality."

THE CHANGING CONSTITUTION

By Robert Pickett

Next to the Bible, the Constitution of the United States is the most nearly sacred to the people of this country. They resent any suggestion that it needs to be changed or that it could be improved. They are inclined to consider any man who suggests an improvement, a traitor. They believe that he is lacking in proper love of country and proper reverence for a Constitution which has served us well.

Of course, after an amendment has been passed and has been finally made a part of the Constitution, then it too becomes almost as sacred as the original document. But always there is the same struggle when any sort of change is suggested; always there are the same accusations and bitter discussions.

This reverence is useful in many respects. It keeps the Constitution from being changed hastily and unnecessarily. It makes the people feel more secure in their government if they know they have something strong to lean back against,—something which has always been much the same, at least as far as their memory goes back. This reverence for the Constitution keeps all sorts of wild and revolutionary ideas from becoming a part of it, for there are always people who wish for changes which are entirely too drastic and sudden. Even if a change is for the better it never works out as well as its defenders expect, unless the people are ready for it and in sympathy with it.

But on the other hand, when this attitude of reverence is carried to extremes it slows progress to a snail's pace and is likely to lead to bad situations which could have been avoided if the people were not so sure that the Constitution is finished and perfect and should be left alone.

Those who are so sure of the absolute wisdom and infallibility of the Constitution should read the story of those stormy days when it was being drafted and written.

If the people of this generation could know how hard fought were the debates over some of the points covered by the Constitution, and if they could know how dissatisfied with the results many of the members of the Constitutional convention were, they would realize that the framers of it had no idea that they were leaving a sacred document for posterity. They argued there for days and weeks about the relative powers of the states. They loved their states in those days. It was not so much a United States of America that pulled at their heart strings as it was Virginia and Massachusetts, Georgia and Rhode Island. They were only trying to evolve some sort of union which would hold them together and give them strength against all external enemies. They were very careful to say that all powers not expressly disposed of in the Federal government were still the powers of the states. And the little states were dreadfully alarmed for fear the big ones would have such a preponderance of power that their own small voices could not be heard. Our senate is a result of their efforts to solve that problem. It gives equal representation to states without regard to population or area. A half dozen other debatable issues came so near to breaking up the convention and sending its members home in a huff, that only the high character of those men and their feeling for the great importance of their mission made them stay to fight it out and finish their task.

I do not mean to depreciate in any way the wonderful document which came out of those struggles. I mean only to suggest that there were differences of opinion in that day as to the best way to solve the problems of the day. There are problems now of which those men never dreamed. This country has changed from an agricultural to an industrial nation. In that day there were no corporations; there were only partnerships then. No large fortunes existed. Women had not evolved to the stage in which they now live. Labor in those days, was a word meaning work, or as a verb 'to work.' The idea of speaking of labor and expecting people in general to understand that you meant the organized workers in industry, would have been fantastic then.

Obviously they had no idea of the interstate problems that were to arise in the future because of the different and vastly improved methods of communication, transportation and commerce. Government control of farms and manufacturing was not even a debatable issue in those times. Manufacturing was done by hand and farming problems were not nearly so numerous as they are at the present.

In the light of these facts I believe that it is safe to conclude that certain changes might be good for the Constitution. At any rate, when any change is contemplated let us not blindly defend the Constitution to the bitter end. Let us, rather consider it rationally before we decide what is to be done.

LIFE'S NADIR—SCORNED BY A SHARK

A shipwreck on the mighty seas,
O worst of all disaster,
Each sailor fought to save his life,
With Neptune as his master.

But I cannot recount to you,
The stories of them all,
So let us take an average one,
And see what did befall.

He was, by men, called Sinbad;
A merry one was he,
Adored by all the sailors bold
Who sail the win'try sea.

He led a happy life on board,
Without a weighty care,
Except his terrible fear of sharks,
Which at him seemed to stare.

He thought he overheard the sharks,
While floating on the dorsal,
Remarking that Sinbad would make
A very tender morsel.

That these sharks should taste of him
Neptune did design,
And Sinbad's boat was overturned,
Into the "sharky" brine.

"Water, water, everywhere!"
So Sinbad had to swim.
"Water, water, everywhere!"
They quickly followed him.

He pushed aside the foaming froth,
He swam with seeming ease,
But many sharks, with lightning
speed,
Were nibbling at his knees.

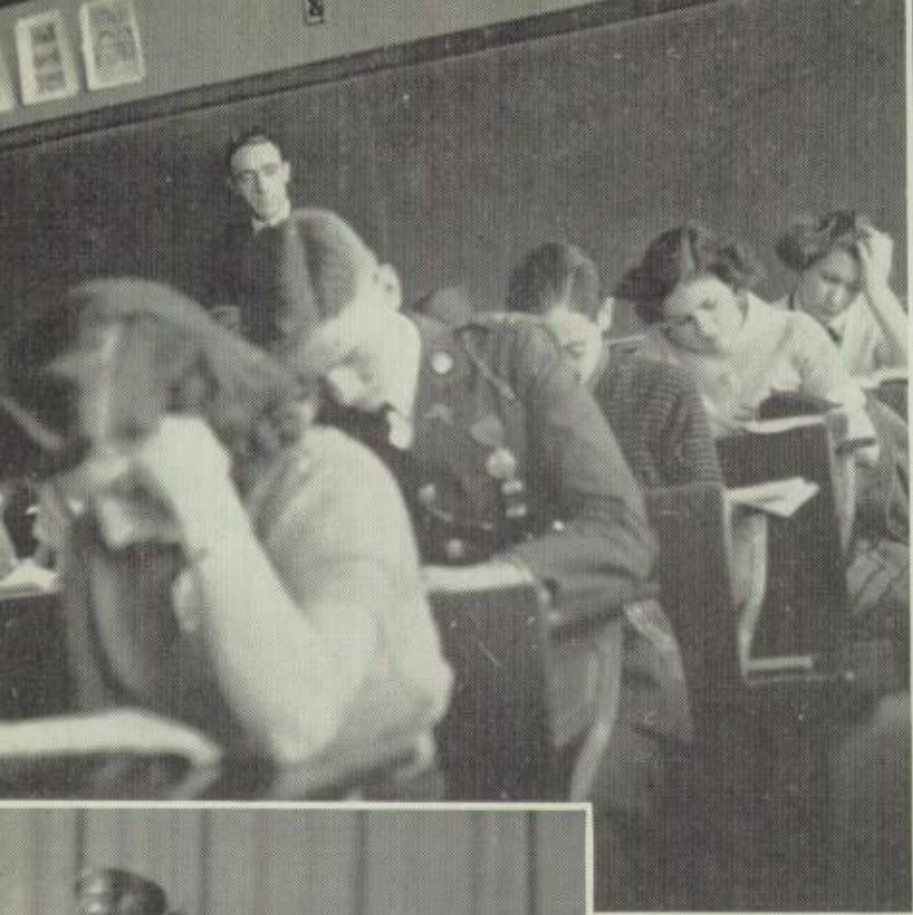

The race was raced for a "meaty"
prize,
Sinbad had to win,
Yet those sharks could almost fly,
Sinbad only swim.

So he was caught and surrounded,
By the tigers of the deep,
And though his legs would bend and jump,
There was no place to leap!

The leader of the sharks arose,
He said, "Let's leave here quick.
The last poor man we ate like this,
Was the one who made us sick."

The sharks then left the tossing
scene,
Those terrible beasts of prey;
Surprisingly, they spared Sinbad,
He even lives today.

THE VILLAIN

This creature aims at you from round
a door,
And shoots when you have struck
the oddest pose.
He talks a lot and makes himself a bore,
With gab of grain, time taken to expose.
He slinks around and makes himself
a pest,
And laughs when people hear his shutter click.
His stupid antics are no good at best;

The way he gloats would make a person sick.
How gladly we'd confine him in a cloister,
To keep him out of other people's hair.
He has as much appeal as the lowly oyster,
And is as popular as an electric chair.
Is there a man, that earth may claim,
this bad?
The candid cameraman, yes, he's

BALLAD OF A TEXTBOOK

My name is "Plane Geometry,"
I once was bright and new;
I sat upon a bookstore shelf,
And looked out on the view.

One day a boy came in the store,
He took me off the shelf,
He paid the clerk a dollar ten,
And had me for himself.

I went to school most every morn,
And came back every night;
I couldn't see much use in this—
His study was so slight.

June came at last. The cards came out.

My owner heaved a sigh,
And when he saw his card, he said,
"Hurrah, I got an 'I'".

His use for me was ended, so
He took me to the store;

He sold me back and said to me,
"I won't need you no more."

Next fall a girl came in the store,
A damsel of great charm;
She liked my looks, and I liked hers;
I went out on her arm.

My circles, squares, and trapezoids
Were quite above her head.
It seemed to me detective tales
Were all she ever read.

She waded through the course somehow,
And finally got an "M."
So to the store I went once more,
And on the shelf again.

In spite of this I still have hopes
That someday I may be
The proud possession of a boy
Who's sure to get an "E."

Robert Osborne

SEVEN O'CLOCK PHILOSOPHY

At ten past seven every morn—
My mind from slumbers rudely torn—

I must arise and wash and dress,
And loiter not, for time does press.
In sixty minutes short and fleet
I must prepare to set my feet
Upon the lengthy way to school,
According to established rule.

Try though I may to look quite ill,
At ten past seven I am still
Forced to forsake my couch of rest;
Of this I just must make the best,
And so I try—I often fail—
To grin and bear, not weep and wail
Against this opposite of heav'n
Which forces me to rise at sev'n.

UNFUNNY JOKES

Warren Evans—Boy, you know when I grow to be a middle-aged man, I shall have as much money as Sloane.

Al Minnis—Sloane who? Sloane's Liniment?

Bud Glazer—Don't rub it in.

Warren Evans—That the liniment!

One Frosh-to-be got quite a laugh out of an article in which a certain bewildered lower—(or should we say lowest?)—classman just couldn't find room 500. "What a sap!" she laughed scornfully. "Why didn't she look on the fifth floor?"

Miss Van Metre—Where is Mt. Ida?

Stanley Irwin—Ida told you if Ida known.

Ruth Higdon—How did you get that scar up there on your forehead?

Kay Marley—I bit it.

Ruth—How did you get it up there?

Kay—I stood on a chair.

One day Mary had her boy friend over and he stayed rather late. About one o'clock the girl's father, in a rage, yelled down the stairs, "It's past midnight! Do you think you can stay all night?"

The boy: "Gee, I don't know; I'll have to call Mom up and see."

IT IS BETTER TO HAVE LOVED AND LOST—MUCH BETTER

'Twas just a year ago today we met,
I asked myself if you were truly real.
I told myself, "At last, the girl ideal."

'Twas just a year ago—could I forget?

I did not know your name—all that I knew

Was that you were so lovely, so divine,

I would not rest till I had made you mine.

But you went on your way, and left me blue.

I wonder now—if I had learned your name,

If you had cared for me—had felt the same

As I toward you—if we had come to know

Each other well enough . . . still, even so,

I'm glad that it worked out the other way.

Just think—I might be stuck with you today.

THE clubs at Southwest High School offer an opportunity to every boy and girl to make new friends and to attain new honors. Each club is designed to stimulate not only the desire to learn more about a certain field, but also the formation of new contacts which will broaden the outlook.

In the literary societies experience is provided in writing short stories, poetry, and essays, and in declamation, extemporaneous speech, and oration. The literary contest, in which these societies vie to outdo one another, is one of the most exciting events of the year.

The Engineers Club comes into closer, more analytical contact with the art and science of the engineering profession, while the Hestian Club makes a study of matters domestic and social. The Boys High School Club and the Girls High School Club stress high Christian ideals. The Art Honor Society rewards artistic talent, as the Quill and Scroll honors journalistic achievement. The latest formed club is the Drivers Club, organized to promote safety.

The National Honor Society is the ultimate goal of every aspiring student. Its members consist of those who have distinguished themselves in scholarship, leadership, character, and service—truly the acme of a high-school career.
